I love nature, but I love people more and so ...By Carol1066I savored this book at the same time that I realized that I would never want to do this myself. I love nature, but I love people more and so I will not spend much time alone in nature during my life. That said, I loved this book and have already ordered several of her other books because I can enter into her feelings without totaling sharing them. Also, of course, she is a gifted writer and a courageous individual who follows her own way. I savor the moments as I read what she has to say.

Chris Czajkowski came to Canadas attention in the mid-1980s when she began writing to CBC Radio's Morningside about a particularly unusual adventure: in her late thirties, she headed into the pristine wilderness of British Columbias Tweedsmuir Provincial Park. There, she single-handedly cleared the land and despite a total lack of experience in construction built her own house. More than simply a lyrical celebration of the natural world, Cabin at Singing River is a story of courage, perseverance and imagination. From the moment Chris sets her inexperienced foot into an unsteady canoe until the triumphant day she stands back to survey the log house she has built, we are irresistibly drawn into her remarkable journey toward independence.
